Military service instills values that drive new pediatrician to excellence

By Alan Jenkins
 Courtesy of Spartanburg Regional Healthcare System

Dr. Catherine Davis knows what it's like to put parents and children at ease. For the past seven years, she has served as a pediatrician to the children of men and women in the armed services as a member of the Air Force.

As a pediatrician in the military, Dr. Davis knew the important role she played in providing peace of mind for parents in uniform.

"Service members can do their job better knowing that their family members are taken care of," Dr. Davis said.

Dr. Davis chose to serve because she admires what the Air Force and the armed services stand for.

"The core values really called to me. Integrity first, service before self, excellence in all we do," Dr. Davis said. "Those are the values that my parents tried to instill in me and the type of character that I would like to display."

Today, Dr. Davis applies those values to the work she does in Cherokee County, as the newest pediatrician at Cherokee Medical Center - Center for Pediatrics.

Returning home

After 11 years away, Dr. Davis returns to the Upstate where she grew up.

"I was born and raised in Spartanburg," Dr. Davis said. "I was born at Mary Black Hospital, so it all comes full circle."

Her father is from Spartanburg; her mother moved there at 2 years old. As a child, Dr. Davis took tap lessons from the same dance school her mother took lessons at as a child.

"I dance any chance I can, but I haven't put on tap shoes in a few years," Dr. Davis said.

She earned her bachelor's degree from the Clemson University Honors College and her MD from the University of South Carolina School of Medicine. She performed her pediatric residency with the military in San Antonio.

A captain in the U.S. Air Force Medical Corps, Dr. Davis completed over seven years of active duty service.

Back in the Upstate, Dr. Davis is surrounded by family - her mom and stepdad live in Chesnee, her father lives in Boiling Springs, and three of her four older brothers live in Greenville with their families. The fourth brother lives in Charleston.

She moves back with Cooper, "a lovable golden retriever," Dr. Davis said.

Building relationships

Growing up in a strong community gives Dr. Davis insight on her emerging role in Gaffney and beyond.

"I'm a pediatrician. My patient is the child," Dr. Davis said. "but part of my role is to care about the parents, the siblings, grandma, grandpa, anyone who is the child's caretaker."

Building a rapport with parents is vital, according to Dr. Davis. Once trust and mutual respect are established, a doctor gets the chance to serve long-term needs as a child grows.

"It's almost like seeing a long-lost friend, even if it's been a year between well visits," Dr. Davis said. "There's something unique about having that continuity and to build on it that becomes an enjoyable experience for everyone."

"Going to the doctor can be fun. It's like seeing an old friend."

Dr. Davis is seeing patients now at CMC - Center for Pediatrics.

Egg cup rack

Many of us have used an antique egg cup to hold a boiled breakfast egg, but few have ever seen an egg cup frame with six egg cups and spoons made of sterling silver over 200 years ago. New Orleans Auctions had many unusual serving pieces in an auction, and the rare 7-inch-high by 8-inch-wide egg cup frame brought $1,625. It was made in London about 1808 to 1811 according to the hallmark. The silversmiths were Robert & Samuel Hennell. The hexagonal frame has six legs with lion's paw feet, a canopy with a shell and scroll finial, and receptacles for the six egg cups and spoons.

A frame was used for large breakfasts as a centerpiece and usually held soft boiled eggs, and there were many servants to dish out the food to each guest. A breakfast menu usually included eggs, bacon, sausage, mushroom toast, grilled tomatoes, baked beans and tea or coffee.

Q: I'm interested in selling a collection of over 200 Vera Neumann scarves. They were made throughout her career, no two are alike, and they're in very good condition. I'd like to sell them in groups or as a whole collection, not individually. How can I find interested buyers?

A: Vera Salaff Neumann (1907-1993) was known for her silk scarves with her signature, "Vera," on them. She was a fashion illustrator, textile designer and muralist. She and her husband, George, founded Printex in 1946. She designed place-mats and other linens. The first silk scarves were made in 1947 after the company bought a supply of army surplus parachute silk. Designs were screen printed, based on Vera's watercolor paintings. She held the copyright for 8,000 designs.

George died in 1962 and Vera sold the business to Manhattan Industries in 1967. She sold her company, Vera Licensing, in 1988. Target bought the rights to reproduce 17 vintage Vera scarves in 2013. Vera scarves are still popular. Check online shops to see what they are selling for. Shops that sell them will also buy them. Expect to get about half what the shop will sell them for. An auction gallery that sells clothing might buy the scarves, but 200 is too many to sell at one time.

Archaeological dig funded by National Park Service to expand knowledge of fort built in 1776 on Clemson University property

From Clemson University News Services

Clemson University researchers have been awarded funds from the National Park Service to continue an archaeological and historical examination of Fort Rutledge on the Clemson University campus. The South Carolina militia constructed the fort in the fall of 1776 following an engagement with Loyalist forces and their Cherokee allies.

Clemson faculty members David Markus and Joshua Catalano have worked together to uncover the site's history since fall 2018, and they finally broke ground on the dig in summer 2020. Markus, assistant professor in the Department of Sociology, Anthropology and Criminal Justice, said there is a good reason for the delay in any digging tools hitting ground.

"No one actually knows for sure where the fort is located," Markus said. "According to records, the fort only stood for around four years before being torn down, so we can't rely on the existing monument to indicate the fort's original location, although it was a good place to start."

The monument Markus speaks of is a roughly eight-foot-high, five-sided stone marker built in 1908 by Trustees of the Clemson Agriculture College at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution. The location was chosen after a crew of African American convict laborers contracted out to the college conducted an excavation in 1907 of what was described as the ruins of a corner of the fort that was still visible at the time.

Catalano, assistant professor in the Department of History and Geography, said the initial dig suggests the fort was, in fact, built near the existing monument, which is located approximately 50 yards from the Clemson Pumping Station. This supports what the archival record and historic maps suggest.

The researchers now

believe that this was the staging ground for the South Carolina militia's ultimately successful efforts to starve out and demoralize the Cherokee people after the Battle of Essenecca. This small engagement, which occurred on August 1, 1776, takes its name from the Cherokee town now submerged under the waters of Lake Hartwell.

Markus and Catalano, along with several undergraduate students, uncovered various iron tool heads, musket balls and projectile points including arrowheads, but more importantly they found what they believe to be the remains of a wall that had been pushed over and buried for centuries. In addition, they discovered soil stains that point to the next areas that might yield more evidence of the fort. During archaeological digs, staining in soil can reveal where structures or objects have occupied areas underground.

Catalano said collaboration with Markus has provided an exciting, hands-on example of the scientific method at work. Initial geophysics and ground penetrating radar provided by Preservation South suggested where the dig should start, but both researchers continually modified their approach and their priorities as the dig revealed new objects, evidence and possibilities.

"The archival research that we are doing directly informs the archaeological plan," Catalano said. "Rather than dividing work between the two of us, we have both been involved in the archival and archaeological aspects, so it's been a really effective blending of our disciplines and our individual approaches."

Catalano said the project has benefitted from collaboration with Clemson Historic Properties, managers of the Experimental Forest, and volunteers, who have coordinated with researchers to provide logistical support and labor. Further study of historical records and increased use of non-invasive geophysics thanks to the National Park Service funding will allow for more efficient, larger scale exploration to more effectively identify objects underground before digging begins.

The researchers said the students working on the dig were invaluable to the research and site activity. Markus said the students get hands-on, practical experience conducting archaeological fieldwork as well as long-term, continuous contact with instructors that simply cannot be duplicated in a classroom. Both researchers said that the enthusiasm and fresh perspectives from students also allowed them to see the site in different ways.

Although the protected nature of the landscape gives the researchers the benefit of time, Markus and Catalano have established an unofficial deadline for themselves to complete the dig and provide more concrete details on the fort in time for the United States Semiquincentennial in 2026. Thanks to initial funding from a Clemson University College of Architecture, Arts and Humanities Collaborative Grant, collaboration with other campus entities and more recent funding from the National Park Service, they are optimistic about the future of the research and meeting this goal.

Additionally, Markus and Catalano plan to develop an interpretive plan that advances a more complete account of the site's history by convening a group of stakeholders among the Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians, the Nikwasi Initiative, and the Museum of the Cherokee in South Carolina. The researchers see this as a necessary, vital component of the work that will help to more accurately tell the story of the Cherokee people and Clemson.

"From an archaeological standpoint, Clemson is largely a 17,500-acre untapped resource," Markus said. "From the plantations like Fort Hill to Cherokee sites dating back to before the American Revolution, we have so much Upstate history right here within our property boundaries. This is the perfect opportunity to more fully incorporate the Revolution story and the Cherokee story into our campus's historical narrative."

The Department of Sociology, Anthropology and Criminal Justice is part of the University's College of Behavioral, Social and Health Sciences (CBSHS). Established in July 2016, CBSHS is a 21st-century, land-grant college that combines work in seven disciplines – Communication; Nursing; Parks, Recreation and Tourism Management; Political Science; Psychology; Public Health Sciences; Sociology, Anthropology and Criminal Justice – to further its mission of "building people and communities" in South Carolina and beyond.
